Dear Subscriber,

People now spend more time online than watching television. And the top destinations are social media sites like Facebook. This month we look at the consequences of sharing too much personal information on social media and ways to protect yourself.

Over Sharing Online Can Cost You Your Job ... And More

For better or worse, social networks give us a platform to share literally everything on the Internet. Have you ever marveled at an offensive Tweet, a questionable Facebook picture or an unprofessional comment on LinkedIn from someone you know?

Most people have an "I hate my job" moment, but it's best not to vent online. See tips on over sharing.

Those same people may discover that what they share on social media can cost them a great job, entrance into a college, a promising relationship or even their day in court. In today's ever-connected, over-sharing world, you should know anything posted online is no longer private! Think twice before hitting "Post." >>>

BY THE NUMBERS /

#1 Social

People spend more time on social networks than any other category of sites with Facebook the runaway leader. Other top networks include Twitter and Pinterest.
